Governor George Pataki grew up in upstate New York working on the family farm where he learned the power of discipline, community, and hard work. His grandparents were immigrants. His father was a postman and volunteer fire chief. George’s mother turned down a college scholarship in order to continue working and support her family, but she was determined that her sons would go to college. George worked year round to afford tuition at Yale University where he led the school’s Conservative Party. After graduating Columbia Law School, Pataki practiced law, and was later elected mayor of Peekskill. From there, his public service continued, and he went on to serve as State Assemblyman, State Senator, and three terms as New York State’s 53rd Governor. He is currently Of Counsel with Chadbourne & Parke LLP, and president of his own small business, The Pataki-Cahill Group, that works in energy, infrastructure, and clean-tech.
